In Case You Missed It: What Educators are Saying About Istation

GREENSBORO, NC – This summer, North Carolina school districts started training with Istation, the new reading diagnostic tool for K-3 students throughout the state. Istation hosted a training session Monday (July 8) in Greensboro, and teachers had high praise for the program.

Educators lauded the program for its ease of use and array of benefits for both the teacher and student.

Below are just some of the thoughts from educators who are seeing the benefits of Istation.

“I feel excited to share with teachers how useful and efficient these tests will be to benefit teachers and students.” – Educator from Montgomery County Schools

“I love both of the reports that were shared today. The summary and priority report will help us provide better instruction for our students.” – Educator from Montgomery County Schools

“The program will allow more instructional time for teachers.” – Educator from Vance County Schools

“This will be another great tool to help us analyze individual student data in order to provide instruction to meet those needs.” – Educator from Montgomery County Schools

“I see a great deal of promise with the program that I didn't initially - I see less room for teacher error and more transparency with many aspects of the assessment.” – Educator from Durham Public Schools

“Love the fact that readings are recorded and takes away the subjectivity from scoring.” – Educator from Durham Public Schools

Educators will continue training throughout the summer and into the fall, with the official assessment rollout starting next spring.

“We're glad to see teachers are learning how Istation could be helpful for not just their students, but themselves,” said Ossa Fisher, Istation President and COO. “Istation was designed to make life easier for educators, and to help them do what they do best – teach.”
